Ahead of the comprehensive midterm election, the Supreme Court is poised to decide whether to take up one of the most closely-watched cases this election year: a lawsuit challenging whether Americans can vote because they are not citizens. The high court will decide in King v. Burwell whether to hear a lawsuit that seeks to strike down two key provisions of the Affordable Care Act. ADVERTISEMENT The plaintiffs, Carol Rose, a Washington state resident, and Kris Kobach, the secretary of state for the state of Kansas, sued the administration of President Obama in February, arguing that the way the federal government provides subsidies for health insurance violates the law. Rose argues that the way the law was implemented causes her to pay more for insurance than she would if the law was properly administered. She and her husband are covered by a plan purchased in the state of Washington, and the cost of that plan is subsidized by the federal government under the law. "She applied for and received a tax credit subsidy on her 2009 premium, which she used to purchase health insurance at a monthly cost of $191.94," according to the lawsuit. "Ms. Rose does not anticipate that the tax credit subsidy she received from the federal government will be reduced as a result of this suit. No matter what the result, Ms. Rose will continue to pay $191.94 for insurance." The lawsuit alleges that the federal government must pay the subsidies in the form of tax credits, and it argues that those tax credits cannot be paid because they are 3e33713323
